André-Adolphe-Eugène Disdéri

André-Adolphe-Eugène Disdéri. José Manuel Hidalgo. 1860. Albumen silver print, 7 13/16 × 9 1/8" (19.8 × 23.2 cm). The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Purchase

In the mid-nineteenth century people collected and exchanged cartes de visite: small images mounted on board. Many served as calling cards, or cards bearing someone's name and image that were left at a person's home to let them know someone had visited. This is an example of an uncut sheet of images by André Adolphe-Eugène Disdéri, which shows the subject in a variety of poses. In 1855, Disdéri patented the carte de visite as well as a technique of making eight negatives on a single plate. The images were cut and a single one was mounted on cardboard. As they grew more popular, cartes de visite were circulated across American and Europe, and the public began to collect images of friends, families, public figures, and celebrities.

Gertrude Käsebier

Gertrude Käsebier. The Road to Rome. Platinum print, 9 3/8 × 13 3/8" (23.8 × 34 cm). The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Gift of Mrs. Hermine M. Turner

Gertrude Käsebier. Happy Days. 1903. Gum bichromate print, 12 1/2 × 9 3/4" (31.8 × 24.8 cm). The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Gift of Mrs. Hermine M. Turner

When Gertrude Käsebier made these images in 1902 and 1903, she was a member of the pictorialist school, which aimed to promote the medium of photography as a fine art. Kasebier used laborious printing processes to create painterly images that were distinct from those created by amateurs and commercial photographers. By 1900, the Kodak Brownie had been introduced to the general public, offering people a camera that made photography easy, fast and economically accessible. Snapshot photography became widespread, but the pictorialists aimed to differentiate their work from the abundance of newly minted photographers during this era.

Josef Albers

Josef Albers. Oskar Schlemmer. 1927–29. Gelatin silver prints mounted on board, overall 11 5/8 × 16 3/8" (29.5 × 41.6 cm). The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Acquired through the generosity of Jo Carole and Ronald S. Lauder, and Jon L. Stryker. © 2020 The Josef and Anni Albers Foundation

Photographs have the power to evoke memories and suggest a sense of time and place. Featuring images of colleagues at the Bauhaus, a celebrated school of art and design in Germany, Josef Albers's photocollages function as both intimate portraits and examples of the school's aesthetic ideals. In this work, Albers presents multiple images of artist Oskar Schlemmer, all made with his handheld Leica camera that he could carry with him at all times. Through the abundance of images, Albers is able to capture the nuances of his subject's personality and document their years spent at the school's Dessau and Weimar campuses.

Gertrudes Altschul

Gertrudes Altschul. Lines and Tones (Linhas e Tons). c. 1952. Gelatin silver print, 14 7/8 × 11" (37.8 × 27.9 cm). The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Acquired through the generosity of Amie Rath Nuttall. © 2020 Estate of Gertrudes Altschul

Gertrudes Altschul was a member of the Foto Cine Clube Bandeirante (FCCB), an amateur camera club in São Paulo, Brazil. Through FCCB, Altschul's photographs circulated worldwide: They were routinely reproduced in the club's monthly bulletin, mailed out for consideration by salons, and chosen for display in exhibitions throughout Brazil and internationally in the 1950s. This photograph of architectural forms in downtown São Paulo was selected for the cover of FCCB's monthly bulletin in September of 1953, and it would have circulated to hundreds of fellow practitioners throughout Brazil and to other photo clubs around the world.
